

“The American Revolution was not a common event. Its effects and consequences have already been awful over a great part of the globe. And when and where are they to cease? But what do we mean by the American Revolution? Do we mean the American War? The Revolution was effected before the War commenced. The Revolution was in the minds and hearts of the People. A change in their religious sentiments of their duties and obligations....”

—John Adams, Letter to Hezekiah Niles, February 13, 1818

Political Science 7991 Seminar: Revolution Spring 2021

When is political change so extensive or so dramatic that it ought to be called a “revolution”? When is revolution justified, and when not? What makes a revolution successful, and why do some attempts at revolution fail? What is the difference between revolution and reform? Is political change sufficient to define a revolution, or must there be social change as well? Can a change in customs or ways of thinking constitute a revolution even if it is accompanied by little or no violence and if it is achieved through established institutions? Can revolutions proceed continuously over a long period of time, or must there be a moment of revolutionary choice? Is revolutionary change always in one direction—for example, towards greater liberty or greater equality—or is revolution simply “regime change,” perhaps cyclical? Is revolution to be hoped for, worked for, or guarded against?
